I: On the Day of Public Thanksgiving, July 21, 1842 The offering of thanksgiving to God, my brethren, is one of the most pleasing duties of a pious soul. The daily mercies which, as individuals, we receive, call for those daily acknowledgments which every good man loves to breathe out in the retirement of the closet. The blessings which we enjoy as families, we delight to acknowledge around the domestic altar. And when a nation, which is only a more extended family, has experienced special and peculiar deliverance, it is seemly that it should collect together its multitude of people, and that all who profess or call themselves Christians, in their several temples should reverently bow the knee before the Father of mercies, while with grateful hearts they utter the memory of his great goodness. Such are the circumstances in which we are assembled on the present occasion. Almighty Cod has, in a signal manner, appeared for us in delivering this community from the horrors of civil war. The instances of his interposition have been so frequent and so manifest, that I have not seen an individual who has not humbly acknowledged them.
