He then, in his fiery manner, demands of the Frenchman, who is totally ignorant of the English language, Art thou a gentleman? What is thy name? thinking, that words so plain must be understood. The old reading should certainly be restored; and which, though gibberish, has a much better effect than the sense, forced out of what our Author, designedly, made--nonsense. In a subsequent speech, when the Frenchman says, pardonnez moy! he sounds it partonnez moy! a manner in which many polite Frenchmen sound it at present, particularly in the northern parts of France: and by this mode of pronunciation, Pistol understands him to mean--a ton of moys. Scene IV.--page 466. Pistol. Moy shall not serve, I will have forty moys; For I will fetch thy rim out at thy throat, In drops of crimson blood. This passage is, perhaps, the most difficult in our...
